Dear Sir Hubert;

It was good to hear from you and to know that the twenty copies of the book arrived safely. The cards you asked for are enclosed. We did not think it wise to break open the shipping containers that the printer provided to encase the books so no cards were inserted.

I agree with you that the new reader will be bewildered and greatly curious. Perhaps his attention could be directed to the "Contents of the Book" beginning on page xiii. This will have to serve as a sort of index until we can finish the job that is now being done on the index.

As this letter is being written, Leone has dug out your old notebook and it will be posted to you this week.

As to how to stimulate interest by directing attention to particular passages: This is a difficult question. Suppose I list two or three different approaches.

For the chap who is most interested in physical things I would suggest:
